Desperately missing from their lives and they wonder if they could ever build a life together...

In 2019, director Ray Yeung captivated films festivals around the world with his film about a pair of older gay men in Hong Kong who have lived as straight their whole lives. In their twilight years, they reflect back on their accomplishments as heads of their families, yet there’s something projected landscapes of the informants’ imagined future homes. . . .

Same-sex relationships. Lai contextualizes her informants in the sociopolitical terrains of post-colonial Hong Kong, revealing the resilience of money and care that makes us hold on to each other as we release ourselves from the pressures of compulsory familism and compulsory heteronormative expectations for work. . . .
